I have been dating a man for the last few months. I have polycystic ovary syndrome (PCOS) and cannot have children. At what point in our dating relationship should I share that kind of information? It is a very emotional situation for me. Thank you for your advice. Jim: First, I'm sorry to learn of your inability to conceive. At Focus we often hear from women who have struggled with infertility in various forms, and we know how difficult it can be. I ran your question by our counseling team, and as for when to reveal this information to your boyfriend, the consensus was clear -- the sooner the better. If you're in your 30s and have been dating several months, I'd be surprised if the subject of marriage hasn't been raised already. Although it may be painful to talk about, this is the type of information your boyfriend needs to know. It establishes and open and honest relationship, too. Although the desire for children is an important consideration for couples considering marriage, it doesn't have to be a deal breaker. There are a number of other important factors for each of you to consider during this phase of dating, including one another's character, families of origin, and so on. Also, it's important to remember that NO married couple is guaranteed biological children. It just doesn't happen for some people, despite their strong desire to have kids. But couples who are deeply committed can weather the storm of infertility and look into other options, especially adoption. May God bless you and your boyfriend as you work through these questions together.
